Bitcoin gets its first major U.S. exchange

A bitcoin medal is displayed at a bitcoin trading club meeting in Tokyo.

by Mitchell Hartman (/people/mitchell-hartman)
Monday, January 26, 2015 - 15:04

On Monday, Bay-Area startup Coinbase launched the first major U.S.-based licensed exchange for the online currency bitcoin.

Other major exchanges are based abroad, and other U.S.-based exchanges have limited liquidity and are not able to handle transactions in as many states as Coinbase can. Coinbase is backed by more than $100 million in investment from banks, venture capital firms and the New York Stock Exchange.

Coinbase says it will allow money managers, institutional investors, businesses and individuals to trade bitcoins with a degree of price stability and reliability that has so far been lacking for the up-and-coming virtual currency.

“We’ve got this respected exchange, that’s in the U.S., that isn’t in Slovenia or someplace in Japan,” says Campbell Harvey, a Duke University finance professor. “It will provide a benchmark for pricing and presumably will lead to lower volatility. Given that bitcoin is still a nascent technology, a lot of people don’t fully understand it or trust it. This gives a degree of comfort.”

About the author
Mitchell Hartman is the senior reporter for Marketplace’s Entrepreneurship Desk and also covers employment.

Follow @entrepreneurguy 930 followers  Read More » (/People/Mitchell-Hartman)

RELATED STORIES

Listen to bitcoin exchanges as they happen (http://www.bitlisten.com/)

Comments

Please log in to post comments.

I agree to American Public Media’s Terms and Conditions (http://www.marketplace.org/terms-use).

©2013 American Public Media